

My bottle seal has a small extension on one edge that acts as a handle, signifying the affordance of the seal to be peeled from one side to the other. The handle can be fully concealed by the bottle cap when it is fully tightened, but when the cap is taken off, it can be easily noticed and grasped for leverage. Since the handle is off to the side and not on top of the seal, it better indicates that the user should peel from one side to the other, rather than pulling straight upwards.
